

Driving through Cardiff last September on my way to university halls with the car packed full of my possessions, I had many things running through my mind. Was Cardiff a nice city? A nice university? What are the people going to be like?

I had been living in America for the past three years so only had my own research online to decide which university to go to. I did not know anyone who had gone to Cardiff University before and seeing as I was living in the wrong country I did not have the chance to visit the campus or go on any tours.

Fresher's fortnight was full of meeting new people, going to societies and sports fairs, exploring the city and of course going out. When lectures started I was glad to find all the lectures very helpful. I am studying Education and I find all my modules very interesting and can't wait for the next two years.

When I graduate I will pursue my dream of becoming a primary school teacher. This decision came very easily to me as for the past two years I have worked in a pre-school. Teaching children seemed to come naturally and it was something I love to do.

My degree this year has mostly consisted of psychology modules, which showed me the less hands on side of teaching. I am confident that Cardiff University will fully prepare me for everything with its great career planning and CV groups.
